New Social, Emotional and Mental Wellbeing Offer for Schools

Swindon Educational Psychology Service (EPS) has developed a new offer to schools in responding to the emotional wellbeing needs of their pupils. This is a new early intervention and prevention offer from the EPS, to help ensure that any difficulties are appropriately dealt with at the earliest opportunity. Assistant Educational Psychologists (AEPs) are psychology graduates with additional experience and knowledge in the application of psychology within education settings. Their work can include carrying out direct interventions with children and young people, support and training for school staff and parent workshops.

Interventions

Working directly with an individual or groups of pupils, the AEP can implement psychological and therapeutic-type interventions to support the social, emotional and mental wellbeing of pupils This could include work, for example, around anxiety, emotional regulation, low mood, self-harm, bereavement, resilience or self-esteem. The AEP can also support with work around social skills and friendships. The format of a typical intervention programme would be six sessions of one hour each as well as a one hour set up meeting, a baseline assessment and brief impact report.

The AEP can also offer a more targeted package of support around those who are struggling to attend school due to anxiety (also known as EBSA -emotionally based school avoidance). This would include initial assessments for students and direct individual therapeutic-type support. The aim of this work would be to explore the barriers to attending school, support the student to be more psychologically flexible and to develop some strategies for managing their anxiety in relation to school attendance.
